Question 10 is based on the following paragraph.

While the English were planting the first frail colonial shoots in the Chesapeake, they were also busily colonizing the West Indies. By the mid-seventeenth century England had secured its claim to several West Indian islands, including the large prize of Jamaica in 1655. Sugar found the foundation of the West Indies economy. What tobacco was to Chesapeake, sugarcane was to Caribbean – with one crucial difference. Tobacco was a poor man's crop that could be planted and processed easily. Sugarcane was a rich man's crop, requiring extensive planting and an elaborate refining process in a mill. Because of the need for land, and the labor to clear it and to run the mills, sugar cultivation was a capital intense business. Only wealthy growers with abundant capital to invest could succeed in producing the crops. So profitable was the sugar plantation system that it too soon crowded out all other forms of agriculture, a development that made the West Indies increasingly dependent on the North America mainland for food and other basic supplies.

The sugar lords extended their dominion over the West Indies in the seventeenth century. To work their sprawling plantations, they imported enormous number of black slaves – more than a quarter of a million in the five decades after 1640. By about 1700, black slaves outnumbered white English in the British West Indies by nearly four to one, and the region's population has remained predominantly black ever since. West Indians thus take their place among the numerous children of the African diaspora – the vast scattering of African peoples throughout the New World.

To control this large and potentially restive population of slaves, British authorities devised codes, formal laws that defined the legal status of slaves and the prerogatives of masters. The notorious Barbados slave code of 1661 denied even the most fundamental rights to the slaves and gave masters virtually complete control over their laborers.

A group of displaced English settlers from Barbados arrived in South Carolina in 1670, bringing with them a few African slaves – and the model of the Barbados code. In 1696, Carolina officially adopted a version of the code, which eventually inspired statutes governing slavery throughout the mainland colonies. The Caribbean islands thus served as a staging area for the slave system that would take root in British North America.

10. The islands of West Indies are located in _____.

- A. Caribbean
- B. Chesapeake
- C. Jamaica
- D. North America
